The Cambridge police altercation spurred a politically charged exchange of views about race relations and law enforcement nationwide and caused then president Obama, the nation's first Black president and a Harvard Law School graduate, to brand the harassment by police stupid.

Obama later entertained Gates and the arresting police officer, Sgt James Crawley, for a beer at the Rose Garden at the White House.

Gates' upcoming public talk is in conjunction with the CWRU Thing Forum series. It which comes at an opportune time and as racial and civil unrest mount internationally relative to President Donald Trump's controversial immigration policies and a proposed federal budget that cuts resources to seniors, the Black community and others, is presented by the F. Joseph Callahan Distinguished Lecture with support from community partner, the Cleveland Foundation.

His speech, said organizers, will also serve as the keynote address for the Baker-Nord Center for the Humanities’ Cleveland Humanities Festival, featuring immigration as its theme.
Gates, 66, is a founder and editor-in-chief of the popular online Black magazine Theroott.com, an Emmy-award winning filmmaker, literary scholar, cultural critic, and institution builder.

He has authored or co-authored twenty-one books and created fifteen documentary films, including the popular PBS series, "Finding Your Roots."

In his new documentary, "Black America since MLK and Still I Rise," Gates embarks on a deeply personal journey through the last fifty years of African-American history.
